When we ask clients about what their future plans are for the business, and specifically what the "exit strategy" is, we are typically greeted with either an eyes glazed over (what the heck are you talking about?) look on their face or some form of a "I don't know, I'll sell it I guess..." type response. Undoubtedly, this issue requires more serious consideration by the business owner.

We don't know who said it first, but Stephen Covey, the author of The Seven Habits of Highly Effective People, lists "begin with the end in mind" as habit number two. This is extremely important for any successful business owner, and that definitely includes restaurant owners and operators. The fact is that you can't operate your restaurant like you will be there forever and then suddenly flip a switch and transform it into the type of business that is organized, well-documented and clearly defined so that a potential buyer can justify paying a fair [or better] price for it.

If you begin with the end in mind that one day you are going to sell your business, then you will have all of the systems, processes and procedures specified and documented. For example, do you have recipes, plating specs and pictures for all of the food offerings on your menu? Do you have drink recipes for all of your cocktails? Do you have an employee handbook and training manuals for your employees? Do you have daily reports and accounting practices and procedures that are written down and followed diligently? These are just some of the things that need to be in place for you to maximize the value of your business when it comes time to try to sell it. The more you have these things in place to set your business up for success, the better opportunity to achieve a premium price for your business when it hits the market.

We see this time and time again. Businesses are configured so that the current owner does a great job operating them and has the ability to maximize profits. The problem is that they are set up so that ONLY the current owner has the knowledge and understanding to accomplish that. What this means is that basically the business is worth more to you than it will ever be to someone looking to purchase it. Needless to say, that is a very bad situation which results in both buyer and seller not being able to achieve the end result they are looking for and both being unhappy.

If you want to sell your business one day, and let's face it, that's pretty much the only exit strategy that provides a positive end result for the business owner, you need to PLAN for it. That means setting the business up for success and positioning it for the day that you are not there working it on a daily basis.

Put the things in place that create VALUE for potential buyers. Have a solid long-term lease that gives potential buyers ample time to generate a reasonable return on their investment. Have detailed books and records that clearly show how the business operates and where there are profits to be made. Have a well-trained staff that operates the business at a high level on a daily basis. Provide documented systems and procedures that transfer knowledge to a new potential owner so that they can continue operating the business efficiently and profitably. One good approach is to think about what you would want to see, as being provided by the seller, if you were buying the business instead of selling it.

Bottom line – the more thought you put into what you are selling and the easier you make it for the buyer to operate the business profitably when they own it, the more it will be worth to a buyer and therefore, the more $$$$ it will contribute to your retirement! ~ The Restaurant Brokers

3 RESTAURANT TECH PREDICTIONS FOR 2019

~ credit: Nancy Luna, NRN

1. Automation will abound

With labor pressures mounting in the restaurant industry, automation is something every operator is taking a hard look at. In 2018, early adopters tapped a burger flipping robot called Flippy and a self-navigating "busboy" named Penny. Flippy, developed by Miso Robotics, is cooking burgers, fries and chicken tenders at CaliBurger in Pasadena, Calif., and Dodger Stadium. Penny is delivering food and drinks at a full-service pizzeria in San Francisco.

2. Drones will deliver

Market leaders such as Grubhub, Postmates, Uber Eats and DoorDash will battle for domination. A differentiator in the space will be those that can add delivery through drones. Uber is already on the move, allegedly designing a drone delivery system called UberExpress that could be operational by 2021, according to a recent report by the Wall Street Journal.

3. Apps will drive visits

To promote the revamped app, Burger King gave away a 1¢ Whopper to anyone standing within 600 feet of a McDonald's while downloading the BK app. The stunt made the BK app the No. 1 most downloaded free app in the Apple App store in the first few days of the promotion.
